Current Experience Evaluation

Journey Map

First Impressions

Doing	Saying	Feeling
Checking every product, seeing that they're sold out Rapidly clicking	"Oh, this is the orders page..." "I don't think I want doughnuts from 2024." "I feel like nothing on this website is up to date."	Frustrated

Investigation

Doing	Saying	Feeling
Clicking through all pages Leaving the site	"My eyes just glaze over the page." "I trust Google more than the website."	Confused

Second Attempt

Doing	Saying	Feeling
Returning to website in early morning Not ordering doughnuts	"I think the website is broken"	Defeated

Takeaways

The journey map was constructed with combined observations of the experiences of four users seeing yonnisdoughnuts.com for the first time and trying to order doughnuts. Their experiences reveal:

- Outdated information on the website harms its credibility
- It is not possible to order doughnuts (one doughnut has since become available)
- The visual design makes information difficult to understand

Additional Points

Clarity

Users struggled to understand certain facts about the Yonni's Doughnut brand:

- Its relationship with Discovery Coffee
- When doughnuts could be ordered

User Flow

The current ordering flow has some points of friction and confusion:

- Mixed boxes are broken into four listings with different naming conventions; users spent extra time here trying to understand the options.
- It is possible to complete and pay for an order of as little as one doughnut, despite the FAQ stating a minimum order size of six. This impacts credibility and may reduce customers' confidence that their orders will be fulfilled.
- The instructions on the order page request that customers include their phone number in the "CC billing field," which is not a field name on the payment screen, and this request is not mentioned during the checkout process. This likely leads to fewer customers providing this information.

Current Successes

Although the current website experience is poor, users noticed and appreciated:

- Good product photography
- Fun logo and brand materials

Website Redesign & Prototype

Goals & Priorities

The redesign was guided by the following goals and priorities:

- Harmonize the design with the Discovery Coffee website
- Retain and develop a distinct brand identity and personality
- Encourage users to explore the website
- Improve clarity and findability of information
- Streamline the ordering process

Home Page

Current home page

The screenshot shows the current website layout for Yonnis Doughnuts. At the top left is the circular logo with a smiling face and the text 'YONNIS DOUGHNUTS'. To the right is a navigation bar with links: 'Order Online!', 'About', 'Contact Us', and 'FAQs'. Further right are icons for search, user profile, shopping cart, and a price tag showing '$0.00'. The main content area features a heading 'It's easy to satisfy your last minute doughnut cravings' followed by a 4-step ordering process. Below this is a note about including a contact phone number and a paragraph about special events. A grid of product categories is shown: 'Mixed Dozens' (4 items), 'Classic Doughnuts' (9 items), and 'Holiday Boxes' (1 item). The 'Mixed Dozens' category is expanded, showing 'Vegan Mixed Dozen doughnuts' for $48.60 (marked 'SOLD OUT') and 'Mixed Half Dozen doughnuts - Bakers' choice' for $24.30 (also marked 'SOLD OUT'). Each product listing includes a small image of the doughnuts and a brief description.

Changes

Dedicated Home Page

The current Home page confused users by landing them directly on the order page, so the redesign includes a dedicated Home page to introduce the brand. This theoretically adds one more click to the process of ordering doughnuts, but in practice, users spent extra time on the original design clicking around the website trying to understand where they were.

The principle of front doors from Information Architecture states that a website should be accessible and understandable regardless of where users enter it. This applies to every page on the website, especially the Home page, where most users will enter. This dedicated Home page will help users orient themselves more quickly and move on to placing an order or finding the information they need.

Use of Pre-existing Brand Materials

In addition to the circular logo, The Number Creative designed a text logo and a mascot for Yonni's Doughnuts which exemplify its classy but fun identity.

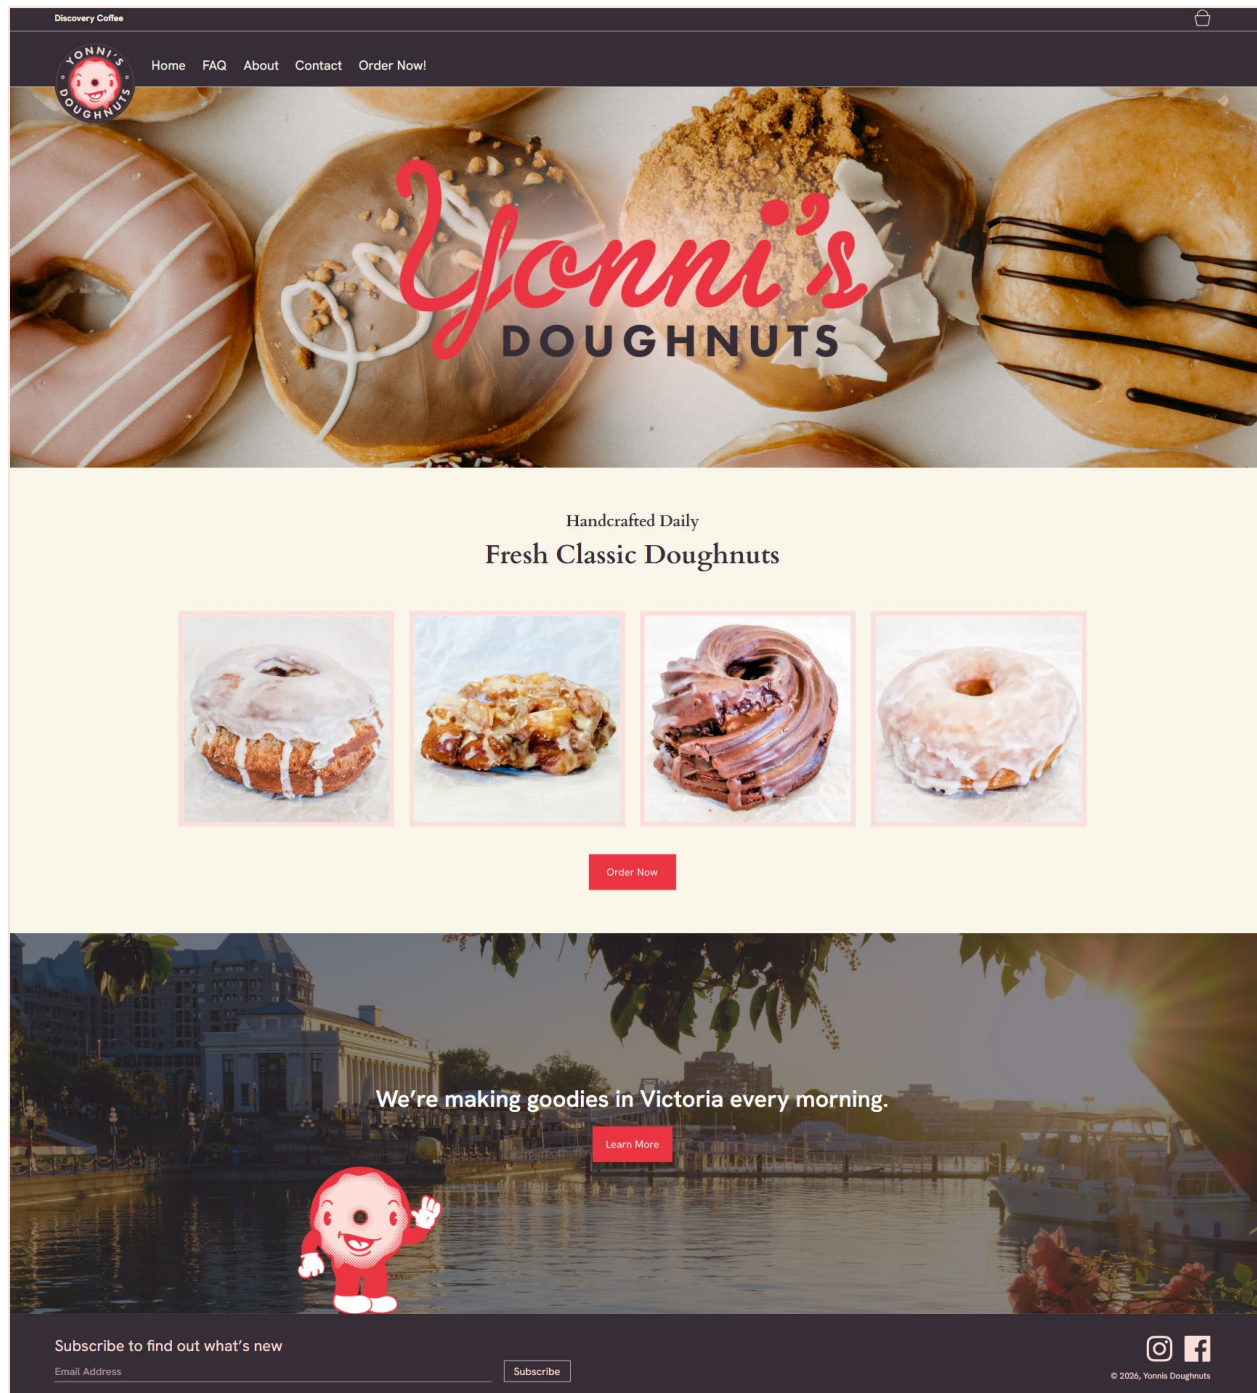

Using these materials on the Home page and throughout the site increases the website's visual appeal, keeping users engaged.

Animated Interactions

Certain items on the Home page and other pages grow, spin, or jump as the user hovers their mouse over them. Users responded very positively to these fun interactions in testing; they increase the desirability of the site, holding users' interest and encouraging them to explore.

Changes

Simplified Text/Instructions

The current design has a large text block of instructions above the items. By updating the order flow to follow standards and to be consistent with Discovery Coffee's order flow, this process becomes intuitive and explicit instructions are unnecessary.

The heuristic of aesthetic and minimalist design suggests that irrelevant or rarely needed information should be excluded from an interface to make way for relevant information. In testing, users were held up by reading the instructions. By removing them and presenting information as it is needed, users are able to move through the interface quicker and more smoothly.

Consolidated Assorted Box Options

The current design led users to have difficulty understanding what all the options are. Because they're variations on one concept, they can be combined into one product listing with the options labeled and easily findable in one place.

Vegan Filter

British Columbia has the highest proportion of vegans of any province in Canada [\[1\]](#). Because Yonni's has several great vegan options, better reaching this sizeable and growing group of customers is as simple as making these options easier to identify.

The current design marks vegan doughnuts at the end of their descriptions, hidden behind a click into their cards. The redesign instead includes an option to filter all doughnuts to display only the vegan ones. This was informed by testing and feedback by a vegetarian user who described how they look for options that fit their diet.

This approach is not applied to the wheat-free doughnut to avoid giving the incorrect impression that it is suitable for those with celiac disease; as stated in the current FAQ, the chocolate cruller is prepared in the same bakery as gluten-containing doughnuts.

Iteration

The first iteration of the Order page indicated which doughnuts are vegan in their titles. However, this gave the impression to some that these doughnuts were vegan substitutes and might not taste as good as their non-vegan counterparts (which, based on a podcast interview with the Yonni's Doughnuts bakery manager [\[2\]](#), is not the case). Additionally, the previously mentioned feedback from a vegetarian user indicated that this design was not as clear as it could be, motivating the move to the vegan filter.

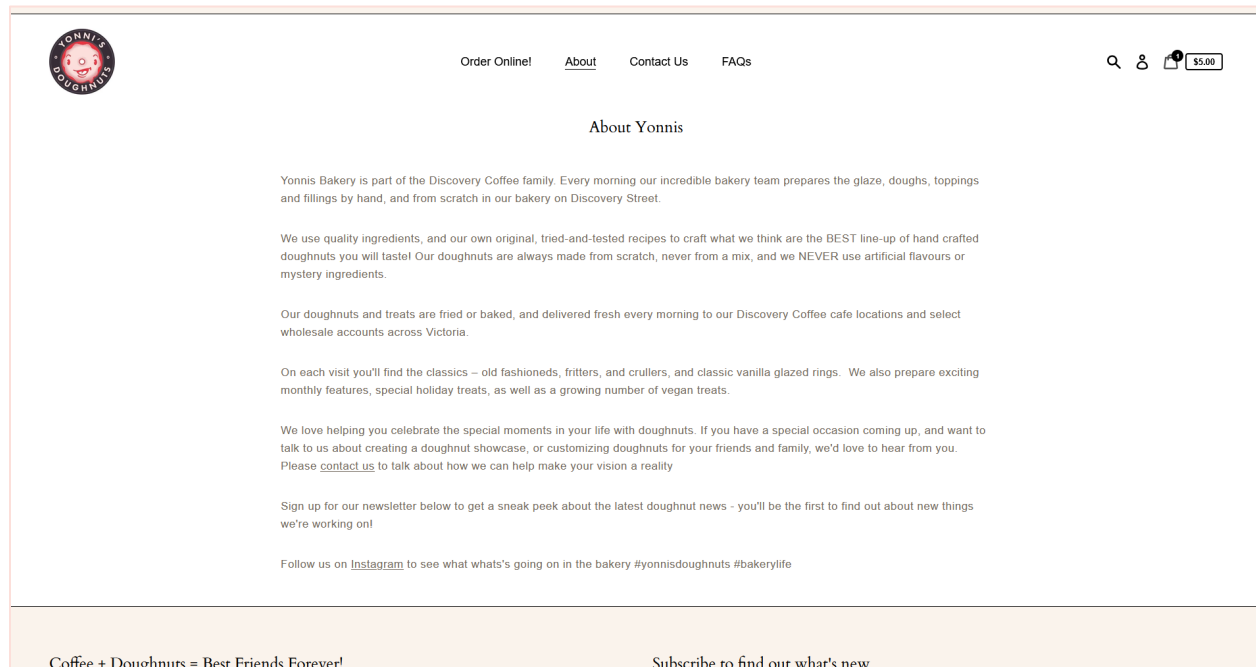

New User Flow

Below is a visualization of the redesign's user flow. It improves upon the current flow by presenting information as needed and preventing the user from checking out with an invalid cart.

About

Current About Page

Changes

Headings and Organization

The redesigned About page reorders and combines information under three headings to improve findability and provide visual breaks to avoid overwhelming the user.

Interactive Image

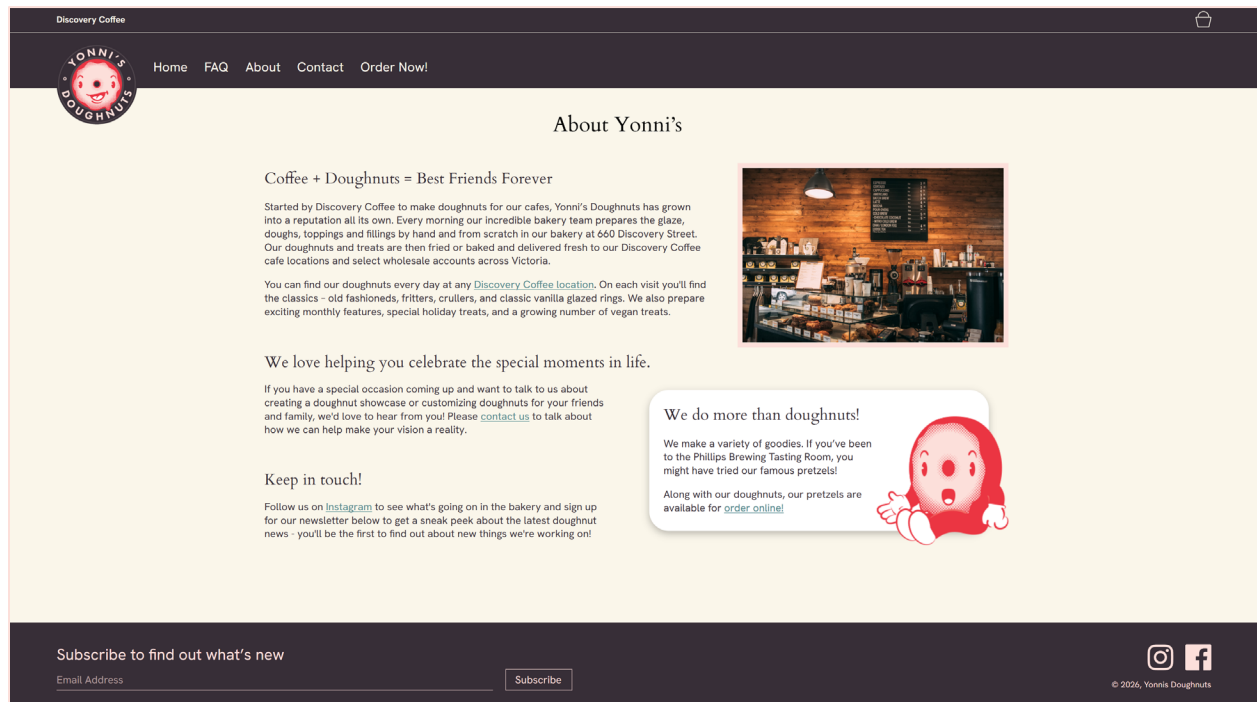

The current About page feels plain and users were uninterested in reading the block of text. The image holds users' attention and makes them happier to stay on the page.

Pretzels Shoutout

The fact that Yonni's Doughnuts makes pretzels and that they are served at the Phillips Brewery Tasting Room can not be readily found anywhere online. The redesign adds a section to address this.

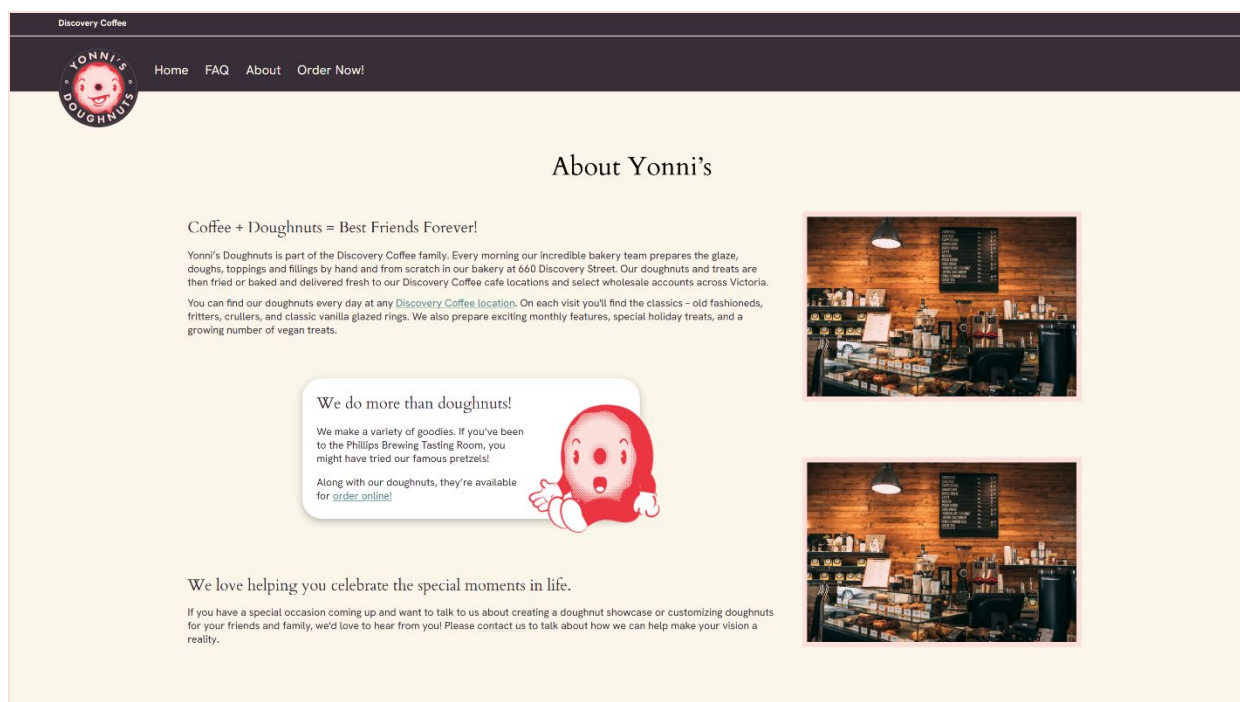

Redesigned About Page

Iteration

The design of the About page started as the design below and went through iterations for balance and clarity based on feedback from peers.

Changes

Accordion

To enable users to find the information they need quicker, the redesign reformats the questions into an accordion menu to hide the answers they aren't looking for.

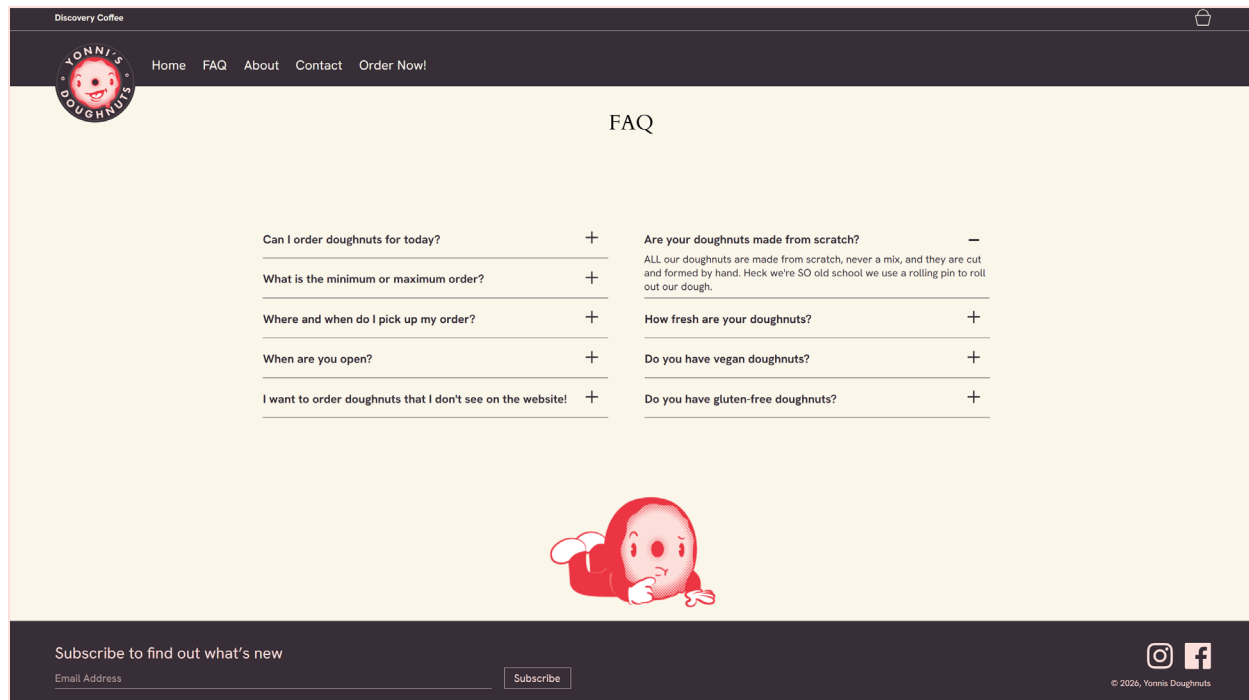

This aligns with the principle of disclosure from Information Architecture; show users only what is necessary so they can find what they need. This helps users access information faster without getting overwhelmed.

Rewritten content

Some content was rewritten for clarity, conciseness, or to avoid embedding negative impressions into the questions. The changes that aren't visible in the prototype are provided in the Figma document next to the FAQ page.

Redesigned FAQ Page

Payment

The current website uses the Shop Pay payment provider, and this doesn't need to change. However, a small tweak can make it better fit the needs of Yonni's Doughnuts.

Remove "Optional" from Phone Number Field

Unfortunately, Shop Pay does not support making phone number a required field on orders with no shipping address [3], such as orders placed for pickup. Thus, it makes sense that the current website requests in bold underlined text on the home page that users provide their phone number when they check out.

Although phone numbers can't be made truly required, the placeholder text in this field (see below for current appearance) can be edited to remove the word "optional" [3] and avoid giving users the impression they don't have to provide this information.

A screenshot of a phone number input field. The field is a light gray rounded rectangle with a thin border. Inside, the placeholder text 'Phone (optional)' is displayed in a medium gray font. To the right of the text is a small gray circular icon containing a question mark.

Other Changes

Pretzels

Currently, pretzels can only be found through the search feature, even though Yonni's is still making this product. The redesign surfaces them to the order page, improving their findability to allow users to discover and order them.

Doughnuts are still the focus, but some language has been changed to refer to items broadly instead of as doughnuts; this supports growth into new product ranges.

Removed Search and Account Features

Users were confused by these features and didn't find value in them on this website.

By excluding features that don't provide value, the website feels more intentionally designed and improves users' emotional impressions of the experience.

Cart Sidebar

Converting the cart from a separate page to an expandable sidebar accessible from any page on the website supports consistency with the Discovery Coffee website. This reduces the cognitive load of adjusting to this website and allows even first time Yonni's Doughnuts customers to use the site confidently.

Minimum and Maximum Order Enforcement

To prevent users from placing orders for quantities that the bakery can't fulfill, the "Place your order" button in the redesign is disabled while the user's cart has an invalid quantity of items in it.

This also improves the credibility of the system, letting users feel confident that the orders they pay for will be fulfilled.

Summary

This prototype reworks the visual design, clarifies information, simplifies the ordering process, and adopts design standards to engage customers, improve the findability of critical information, elucidate Yonni's connection to Discovery Coffee while developing a unique identity, and improve the ability of potential customers to make purchases.
